

Cooperate to Compromise

In order to insure U.S security and stability we must rely on cooperation among the great powers of today. Our world is dealing with concerns with our environment, immigration, trade, and nuclear proliferation that have burdened our societies and our international relationships. We must compromise by addressing common world issues that stand in our way of further development. This would allow the suspicion and trust issues that prevent international organizations from working together. We would be able to come together with our common values and concerns as our main priority to open up our world to new ideas and appreciations.

Environmental concerns could be dealt with my new ideas and cooperation with the "Go Green," hypothesis. Cooperation with other countries would make emigration less of a necessity and nuclear proliferation and threats less of a concern due to stronger relations among nations. Also new trade compromises can be made and developed because of the stronger ties and relationships throughout the world and newer trading partners that would be brought about due to the trust that would develop internationally.

Benton Central, Oxford, IN